TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 6.

Wendell Phillips on the Administration.

Wendell Phillips lectured in Boston on Saturday night last. The audience was made up of labor reformers, woman suffragists and prohibitionists. The following are some extracts from his view of the situation. He said:—

So to day, when a new current of opinion seems to prevail; when a notable change of feeling seems to have taken place regarding the proper policy to pursue toward the Southern States; when not only the mood of the administration seems to have changed, but the public seems to have lost the terror and enthusiasm that once characterized their politics, it is well for us to remember that there is very little real change. It is simply that the men who stand at the front to-day were not at the front five, seven, ten years ago. They did not represent they were not in accord with, the doctrine of that hour, but they have always stood where they are to-day.

Half-made democrats, half-baked republicans —doughfaces both—have not conquered many opinions on either side, and men stand on two great sides, as they have done before. Undoubtedly the end of the Southern dynasty was assured when slavery, the great bond which held these Southern States together, ceased to be; but the great power lasted so long that three out of five men at the North were made over into snobs, and the principal criticism which I have to make against the administration is not in regard to any one act, but in its lowering of self-respect and the snobishness which has marked the course of the acting President toward Southern men. He has said, in effect:—"You Southern men were honest, but mistaken, in the war; the men of the North were fanatics."

Whatever may have been the lack of foresight and good judgment in this administration, its most offensive manifestation has been its deference to Wade Hampton and the Southern leaders. It is the mood of the administration of which we chiefly complain. Now, the best virtue, and the most difficult to attain, is perseverance—holding on. There are to-day men like Robert Rantoul, of whom it was said, in no invidious sense, that he carried Essex county in his vest pocket. There is Morton, of Indiana. He represents more than a name; he represents a State. But the present administration so drew the line that it could not admit such as he.

What has it called to its support in the Cabinet? Good legal ability, average professional reputation, fair standing in certain localities, but nothing better or more influential than this; consequently at every step of the administration a man has only to fold his arms and laugh.
Take its last exhibition. The best member of the Cabinet, the ablest by far—the man who by his profession reputation and as near something like statesmanship as the administration affords—where do we find Mr. Evans? He has been setting his foot squarely down on the possibility of the administration seeking advice from the delegations of the States in Congress.
But now where do we find him? Where but in Pennsylvania, check by jowl with Don Cameron, trading. Of course, like all beginners, he was cheated, and now the administration must either accept the trade and violate its principles or it must lose Pennsylvania, and the loss of Pennsylvania and Ohio will be a complete surrender to the Southern democracy.
Now, every man who looked at the matter must have seen that this would have been the result.

Even in the civil service reform, were gospel unadulterated, it would have been a man, who is now. No general ever seeks to remodel his army in the very presence of his enemy. Wellington, in Portugal, had to remodel his force, but the work was done behind solid granite walls. But what has this new departure of the administration attempted, on the hot ashes of a civil war, with the ranks of the North and South still drawn up in hostile array? It has met the men who ostracized the most popular soldier of the Southwest because he took the oath of allegiance to the Government—General Longstreet, in the face of a determined enemy, with legions hostile to the Government absolutely drilling in the Southern States, the republican party has undertaken to remodel its whole army, to reverse the whole system of political management which has prevailed in this country during the last fifty years, and to choose new advisers.
How can an administration expect to win the battle under such conditions? Indeed, the results of this new departure are already seen.
State after State has discarded its leadership, and so at last the administration, on the signpost down and tried to ride two horses, and the only unsundered man in the Cabinet is brought to disgrace. Then there is that violation of all rules of generalship committed by this administration, leading General Sherman into the place where he is no retreat. Clear indeed once led his armies to a spot where the issue was victory or death, but that was a desperate step, and one which every general should avoid, if possible.
